Preface

This leaflet is an excerpt from my poetry work 'The Endmorgan Quartet' (1997-2008) which consists of 16 books of poetry. The present excerpt is the two first parts out of four in book 16. The dates of writing are given in the righthand column. It was in early March 2008 that I came across Midori's recordings of Bach and Bartok (the latter with Robert McDonald) from november 2007. I had been to her concert in London in the end of September 1997 when I wrote the poem "All the shadows are good" which was the first poem in 'The Endmorgan Quartet' written from beginning to end without subsequent editing. This came to be the style of writing throughout the rest of the work. I sent her the poem, and it was only in 2008 that I discovered that the 15 lines in the poem make for a sort of contents overview of the 15 first books in the work. Could be it is the tradition from Dante which made it natural for me to expect some correlation in my 16th and last book in the work with her recording - as indeed turned out to be the case.

The study is about the relation between the muse and the poet, also with a view to the poetic logic therein. The principle of alignment is 2 seconds music per line of poetry, which seems to be a (presumably universal) constant. That of course is a great discovery as part of this project. But a poetic articulation can be written on a single line or on two lines with indentations after the first. Linebreaks are often conceived as integrated parts of an articulation, but the trivial case of linebreak due to too short page width (for example 0146 in Bartok 1, a line written in Minsk) is not interesting for this matter. In Bach, unindented with following indented lines count as a single unit of 2 seconds, while in Bartok every line - indented or not - counts as 2 seconds. Slash without space indicates alternatives or simultaneous forms - such as 'near/wear' = 1 syllable. Small capitals and boxed text denote visual elements, but these are not always assigned time value. There are some inconsistencies and the alignment must count as tentative and the reader is of course free to experiment.

The book along with the music is an example of a poetic function - the one in the relation between muse and poet. It is the 16th poetic function in The Endmorgan Quartet. As with the other 15 functions, it has one local (in the book) and one global (relative to the full 16-volume work) scope. In this booklet only the local is contained, which perhaps can be perceived. That is partly also a result of the notable functionality relative to the articulation of beauty towards the end of this excerpt (see also the front page) - it calls for inclusion in a larger framework. One can consider the present part an example of a derivation in poetic logic on the specific topic of the relation between muse and poet. That is also the relation which can open up for a new information technology.

The poetry was handwritten in a notebook which was transcribed to computer around Christmas 2007 and was not available to the public in any form before May 2008.
